

My heart burns with sadness as I imagine, lazily lounging in the glum dimness of the inside, slowly rocking back and forth on your creaking wooden chair, bathing in the cool jets of the air-conditioning. Eyes glued tight to the newest video game in the market. Patiently shielding their eyes from the glaring sun and waiting for the lunch bell to ring. We are leaving kids to rot in the icy coldness of the indoors, and slowly fresh air and an azure sky will be a past dream for them. This problem is a clarion call for a good solution - installing a new playground into our campus. A playground would institute a strong sense of creativity, exercise and friendship. We must establish a new playground in the school.

More often than not, kids find it much easier to socialise and make friends when everyone is having fun. Fun is perhaps the cornerstone on which children establish all further learning upon, including communication skills, empathy, patience, sharing and socialising. And a playground can easily help kids find a way to make true friendships and collaborate with them through the power of play. Kids will learn to value these friends that they make as a child, because no one has managed to walk unscathed through the rocky path of life alone. No one. We all need our friends, our confidants to help us through our challenges. And this is what playgrounds can provide us with.

Kids in the modern 21st cling onto addictive electronic devices. However, this is not healthy for kids and we must help them to grasp the outside world and exercise. Playgrounds are an enjoyable method for kids to exercise, helping them to enjoy playing outside with their peers. For example, students' motor skills were improved by 53.7 percent when exposed to playgrounds. They found it easier to learn athletic movements and new sports compared to those who did not, finding it easier for them to do many activities than those who did not participate in sport. This is a valuable skill that we should value and embrace along with installing a new playground in the campus.

A playground can be a valuable tool to enable student creativity. For example, rarely would it be that kids use the slide as just a slide. A slide could be a hiding place, it could be a legendary dragon monster, it could be just about anything. Students have the freedom to find entirely innovative ideas with just their minds and imagination. According to statistics, students who were allowed to play on playgrounds recorded to be 52.2% more creative than students who did not. It would be an invaluable asset for all students as it enables them to look at problems in a revolutionary manner and to think outside the box rather than just relying on a single, repetitive formula. We need to rely on playgrounds to establish an environment that will enable them to think and imagine.

A playground could be the school's answer for inspiring a happy generation of students. It would establish a strong sense of creativity and community along with practising your athletic talent. So we must create a new playground and an entirely new and reset students.
