#1: "Should kids under 13 be allowed to have their own social media accounts? Ave you ever felt isolated that you aren't allowed to use a device, and also having a fear of missing out on the internet? The fear on missing out driver many kids to seek social media access, as they believe their peers are living exiting lives online that they're not part of, which is exactly why social media is a huge part of the community."

a. Strengths:

- You pose a thought-provoking question to engage the reader.
- You address the concept of FOMO (Fear of Missing Out), which is relevant to the topic.

b. Weaknesses: Main issue: Lack of coherence Your opening paragraph lacks a clear structure and jumps between ideas without smooth transitions. For instance, you move from asking about social media accounts to discussing device usage, then back to social media access. This makes it challenging for the reader to follow your argument.

c. Exemplar: "Should children under 13 be allowed to have their own social media accounts? Many young people experience a fear of missing out (FOMO) when they're not connected online, believing their peers are living exciting lives that they're not part of. This drive to stay connected is precisely why social media has become such a significant part of our community."

Here are five tips on how to use social media beneficially: 1. Don't use easy passwords to your account like 246810, because they are extremely vulnerable to hackers and they might steal personal information about you. 2. Set a virus protection to protect you from computer viruses and malware. 3.take a break from the device every hour. 4. Block any inappropriate content that is not suitable for your age. 5.block anyone who cyberbullies you or sends you links for you to put in personal info."

a. Strengths:

- You provide practical tips for safe social media usage.
- You address multiple aspects of online safety, including password security and cyberbullying.

b. Weaknesses: Main issue: Inconsistent tone and formatting Your writing shifts abruptly from a formal tone to a more casual one, using exclamation marks and informal language like "Don't". Additionally, the formatting of the numbered list is inconsistent, with some points starting with capital letters and others not.

c. Exemplar: "While the risks of social media can outweigh the benefits, it's possible to transform it into a beneficial and productive tool. Consider these five tips for safe social media usage:

1. Use strong, unique passwords for your accounts to protect against hackers.
2. Install virus protection software to guard against malware.
3. Take regular breaks from your device to maintain a healthy balance.
4. Utilise content filters to block age-inappropriate material.
5. Block and report users who engage in cyberbullying or attempt to phish for personal information."

#3: "In conclusion, I think children under 13 are not even to using social media. No way ima going to let my children use social media when i grow up. Children under 13 are to young and are very vulnerable to hackers as they are very gullible to traps and scams. They are also to young to be watching inappropriate things and can also be cyberbullied in chats."

a. Strengths:

- You clearly state your position on the topic.
- You provide reasons to support your stance.

b. Weaknesses: Main issue: Informal language and grammatical errors Your conclusion contains informal language such as "No way ima going to" and several grammatical errors, including "to young" instead of "too young". This undermines the credibility of your argument and distracts from your main points.

c. Exemplar: "In conclusion, I believe children under 13 should not be permitted to use social media. When I become a parent, I will not allow my children to use these platforms at such a young age. Children under 13 are too young and vulnerable to hackers, as they can easily fall prey to traps and scams. Moreover, they are not mature enough to handle inappropriate content or potential cyberbullying in online chats."
