

Dear Dolhabon School P & C, we have a multicultural week coming up, and I want to suggest the greatest and most brilliant idea in the world. I'm going to suggest adding food trucks to sell food in various cuisines. The food will be affordable, mesmerising and delectable, and the learning experience will be remembered, captivating and fun.

Some students in our private school lack pocket money payments or money in general. They can't afford lunch from our world-famous cafeteria, where Michelin-star chefs cook in front of crowds of hungry and bored students, waiting for their enlightened lunch.

These food trucks will be affordable. They are not worth hundreds of dollars; they are only worth five dollars.

The food will be extremely delicious, and it will be an enjoyable experience for all the students to remember.

Finally, the learning experience is also going to be great. It will be taught by the chefs working in these food trucks, and the chefs will explain how to make it, where it came from, how it tastes and how to eat it.

In conclusion, having food trucks for one week instead of expensive Michelin-star foods is a truly excellent idea. The accessible prices, the delicious food and the learning experience is a great way for students to appreciate this school and various cultures more.

From Leonardo Peritus Rex.